Documenting Decline In Hospice

In hospice, we need to document achievement of goals while also documenting the progress of a patient's disease which in most cases is declining. When patients are having good days, I think it is sometimes natural to focus on that in documentation and not always accurately document the physical things that are still going on."

Accurate Documentation Helps Hospices Avoid Audits ...

The change regarding the physician's clinical judgment does not negate that the hospice needs to be certain that the physician's clinical judgment can be supported by clinical information and other documentation. An agency's hospice software should have an easy-to-use feature to collect this information at admission. Collecting these documents at admission will serve as the baseline status to confirm a decline throughout the patient's time on hospice, assisting with justification of ...
